“WE HAVE MADE PROGRESS IN EVERYTHING, YET NOTHING HAS CHANGED”: ADDRESSING EDUCATIONAL EQUITY AND JUSTICE THROUGH CRITICAL RACE THEORY COUNTERNARRATIVES

Derrick Bell, the godfather of critical race theory, laments his worse fear on race in the title quote, “we have made progress in everything, yet nothing has changed”. Indeed, educational research shows that schools are just as racially segregated today as they were pre-Brown v. Board and there is still a huge opportunity divide based on race. How does the lived experience of students inform the racialized trends in education? This talk will share three counternarratives through a critical race theory lens to further meaningful dialogue about equity and justice in our schools and communities.

LARISSA MALONE, PH.D.

Larissa Malone, Ph.D., is an Assistant Professor at University of Southern Maine in the Teacher Education Department. A critical race theorist, Dr. Malone's research centers on the minoritized experience in schooling, inclusive of students, parents, and teachers. She is particularly interested in how the marginalized navigate educational spaces and the intersection of education, race, and tangential disciplines, such as religion, geography, and identity development. In 2021, she began the Maine Black Educators Collective, whose mission is to support Black educators in the state of Maine through educational opportunities and social-emotional connection.
